Young Women's Complaint of the Way They Are Deserted at Dances by Their Partners.

A belle of this city makes the complaint that so many of the young men do not know how to treat a girl after they get her to a party. They are nice and kind about asking the girls to go, take them in good style and get them into the room, but after to look out for herself. The young man has every number, but pays no attention to whether the girl be took to the party has her card filled or & partner for each dance. Some of the girls say that one reason they have given leap-year parties was to show the young men 'how the young women would like to be treated themselves, but only in a few instances has this had the desired effect.

One of the chief reasons why a number of ladies do not wish to have publicity given to their entertainments through the papers is that they "owe" so many people or are under "social obligations" to so many, that all who are not fryited will feel slighted. Every lady who entertains knows that she cannot have all who are on her visiting list every time she enkertains any one; on the contrary, large parties are the exception and not the rule? When Mrs. X. invites twenty or thirty friends in for an informal company some afternoon or evening, Mrs. D., who has enter ained Mrs. X., ought not to feel that she ought to be included in the list, but Mrs. D. eften does feel that way, and she is more than likely to express herself so to some friends. Mrs. D. herseif enhaps Mrs. X.'s house will not accommodate as many as the Propylacum, and every one lation of the officers of the George H. knows that the large parties are not alknows that the large parties are not always the most satisfactory ones. Ladies, and men, too, for that matter, like to go to small parties where they can see every one who is there, and have a little chat. At a large party this is impossible. Small parties are less for hal affairs. Besides, one cannot put on one's party gown every day; it would become top common. The big party must be an event, and not an every-day entertainment. Nevertheless Mrs. thinks she ought, to go to Mrs. X.'s, whether Mrs. X, has ten or a hundred. This matter of "feelings" cannot be regulated his death. by law; if it could, the Local Council would do a good work to undertake it with the Miss Harriet Hos novelties of the season, and there are so many possibilities in the hearts, Cupids, flowers and other levices suitable for the day. A valentine luncheon allows many new ideas, a valeatine dance is another; and, altogether, St. Valentine's day may be celebrated in a dozen different ways. A heart luncheon is pretty to give either for engaged girls or for brides. A heartshaped table, with everything served in heart shape, is a compliment, and a card party on that day may have hearts for its tally cards, decorations, refreshments and prizes. The game of "hearts" is another feature to be introduced.
